UNITED STATES NAVY

The seeds of the United States Navy are to be found in the domestic transportation, the overseas trade, and the possibilities for a thriving ship building industry in the colonies. Colonial America was destined to become sea-minded, with every phase of life so necessarily influenced by maritime affairs.

In Massachusetts alone, more than 700 ships had been built by 1676. Out of 7,694 vessels engaged in British commerce in 1775, 2,342 were American built.

American colonial ships were finding profitable trade routes through the principal ports of Europe and the West Indies. But the main sea commerce existed between the Southern colonies and the Mother Country. The English Navigation Acts necessarily saw to this. The majority of the Northern colonies' exports went to Southern Europe.

But it should be remembered that preparation for a fight was an essential part of colonial seagoing plans. A commercial voyage, begun when the world was at peace, might easily end in war between the two contracting countries. It was a common practice for colonial merchant ships to set out on their overseas ventures, armed with substantial batteries of broadside guns.

England was mistress of the seas when war broke out between the colonies and the Mother Country. American ships had found any port open to them under English protection but the coming of the war changed all this. The colonies were forced to fight their own battles, both in trade and in warfare. The American Maritime Service was comprised of many trading ships, but no ships of war for protection had ever been built.

The leaders of the American Revolution found little difficulty in gathering together an army, though untrained. But to organize a navy from commercial vessels, to fight the British men-of-war, was not an easy matter. When the trouble between the colonies and the Mother Country began, the colonies had not a single ship large enough to meet any one of the British fleet. Private persons were granted permission to fit out hundreds of small boats, and these privateer vessels forced the British Navy to protect their own merchant ships, thereby lessening the attack on American commerce to some extent. But this was only a makeshift navy. The first session of the Continental Congress said nothing about ships. To intercept merchant ships bringing supplies to British troops stationed in the colonies, the small armed vessels of the colonists were used, manned by New England seamen. At first, this was done under the auspices of Rhode Island and Connecticut.

When the second session of the Continental Congress met, the situation was felt serious enough to warrant the appointment of a Marine or Naval Commission, "to consider, inquire and report with respect to the organization of a naval force." With John Adams at its head, the Naval Committee began to function.

Fortunately for the colonists, there was one man among them who had spent his early life as an English seaman. This man was a native of Scotland named John Paul, who added Jones to his name after he came to America. The Commission invited him to come to the meeting.

They met at Philadelphia, and Jones showed them that they could not hope to cope with England for the mastery of the seas. His plan was to build colonial naval vessels, neither too small nor too large. He thought that a squadron of frigates, ships rating from 32 to 36 guns, should be kept constantly in British waters, merely to harass the enemy. He further advocated one sharp encounter, which would raise Europe's estimate of the colonies. This could be accomplished by bringing the prize into some French port.

Congress abided by his suggestions and in 1775 ordered 13 frigates to be built. And, in 1776, the Navy had 31 cruisers mounting 586 guns, supplemented by no less than 136 privateers mounting 1,360 guns. The government war vessels in service during the Revolution numbered 64, including the flotilla on Lake Champlain. The destruction that these ships meted out to the British Navy was one of the strongest factors leading to peace. The American force captured 196 vessels, valued at about $6,000,000. The privateer auxiliary force took some 600 British ships.

John Paul Jones—Whose famous words, "I have not yet begun to fight," in the victory of the Bon Homme Richard over the Serapis in 1779, gave our Navy its first bit of glorious tradition.

Congress formed the nucleus of her Revolutionary Navy by purchasing two ships, the Alfred and the Columbus, and two brigs, the Andrea Doria and the Cabot. They were converted to warships and Esek Hopkins, now almost forgotten, was made Commander-in-Chief of the Navy.

With this beginning of a naval force, Hopkins did what he could to fight the British. The first ship captured was the Edward. John Barry, in the Lexington, was responsible for this action. Later he took command of the Raleigh.

John Paul Jones, after some small successes in local waters, left to carry the war into British waters. The British insisted upon calling him a pirate when he attacked the forts at Whitehaven and landed upon Scottish soil. He planned to go right around the British Isles, but, in the Irish Channel, his plans were thwarted. He met the British sloop-of-war, the Drake, and after very sharp fighting, captured her and brought his prize into a French port. The Drake was a more forceful vessel than the American boat, and when the prize was brought into port, the French could hardly believe their eyes.

With his object to startle the world, Jones did all he could to gather together a squadron. Louis XVI gave him a large merchantman, the Duras, and he immediately changed her name to the Bon Homme Richard, in honor of Benjamin Franklin. Within three months, he had a squadron of five ships ready and was off to sea.

The summer was spent cruising around the British coast, alarming the people. But one morning, a British convoy of forty sails was sighted off Flamborough Head. They were sailing under the protection of two British men-of-war, the Serapis, commanded by Captain Pearson, and the Countess of Scarborough, commanded by Captain Piercy. Captain Jones ordered his ships to fall in line and immediately gave chase to the enemy convoy. The merchantmen got away, but the two men-of-war accepted the challenge and drew up for the fight. It was a bitter struggle, and when for a time firing ceased on the Bon Homme Richard, Captain Pearson asked if she had surrendered. "No, I have not yet begun to fight," answered Captain Jones.

The American captain maneuvered his boat to the side of the Serapis and anchored the two ships together. Captain Pearson struck his own colors, but the Bon Homme Richard was sinking. She sank the next day, but she had captured the ship which sank her.

The Hancock, Raleigh and Randolph, along with other cruisers authorized by Congress, were excellent ships and there were none superior afloat to the Alliance and Confederacy, built toward the close of the war.

In 1777, Commodore Nicholas Biddle sailed from Charleston in the frigate Randolph. Accompanied by four vessels of the South Carolina Navy, the General Moultrie, Notre Dame, Polly and Fair American, Biddle set out on an offensive, searching for British vessels in the vicinity. Learning of the enemy's departure, he proceeded to the West Indies. Near Barbados, his squadron fell in with the 64-gun ship, the Yarmouth, and engaged her.

Though wounded early in the action, he directed affairs from a chair on deck. But the General Moultrie fired on the Randolph by mistake and, though the Randolph handled the Yarmouth very roughly for a period of about fifteen minutes, she blew up in her moment of glory. The rest of the squadron escaped.

In September of the same year, Commodore Barry, in command of the Raleigh, sailed from Boston alone. Almost immediately, he sighted the British vessels, the Experiment and the Unicorn. Barry sought escape but, after almost three days, the Unicorn caught up and in a few broadsides did considerable damage to the Raleigh. After receiving three more broadsides from the Experiment, the Raleigh struck for shore, but the fighting continued. Barry landed the crew during the night, first arranging combustibles to destroy the ship. Why the orders to burn the ship were not carried out, no one knows, and the British caught the Raleigh afloat and commissioned her in the British service. A court of inquiry absolved Barry of any blame.

Mention should also be made of the successful squadron cruises in 1779. The frigates Warren Commodore J. B.

Hopkins; Queen of France, Captain Olney; and Ranger, Captain Thomas Simpson, captured the British privateer, Hibernia, east of Cape Horn. The next day they chased a convoy from which seven ships were taken, including the twenty-gun Jason and the privateer Mariah.

In June, the American ships, the Boston and the Confederacy, captured the British privateer ship Pole, the six-gun schooner, the Patsey, and one other prize.

A squadron, under Commodore Abraham Whipple, operating east from Boston in July, captured eleven very valuable prizes from a convoy headed homeward from Jamaica. Three of the captured vessels were subsequently recaptured, but the remaining eight vessels were safely taken into Boston.

The frigates, Deanne and Boston, were equally as successful on a cruise out of Chesapeake Bay later in the summer. They captured eight prizes, including the sloop-of-war, Thorn and the packet ship, Sandwich.

Mention should also be made of the naval force fitted out in New Orleans by Oliver Pollack.

A setback to the colonists occurred, however, when the Penobscot Expedition met disaster with a British naval force, headed by the 64-gun ship Raisonable. Commodore Saltonstall, Captain Moses Brown and Captain Hacker were in command of the American ships, the brig Diligent, the frigate Warren and the sloop, Providence, respectively.

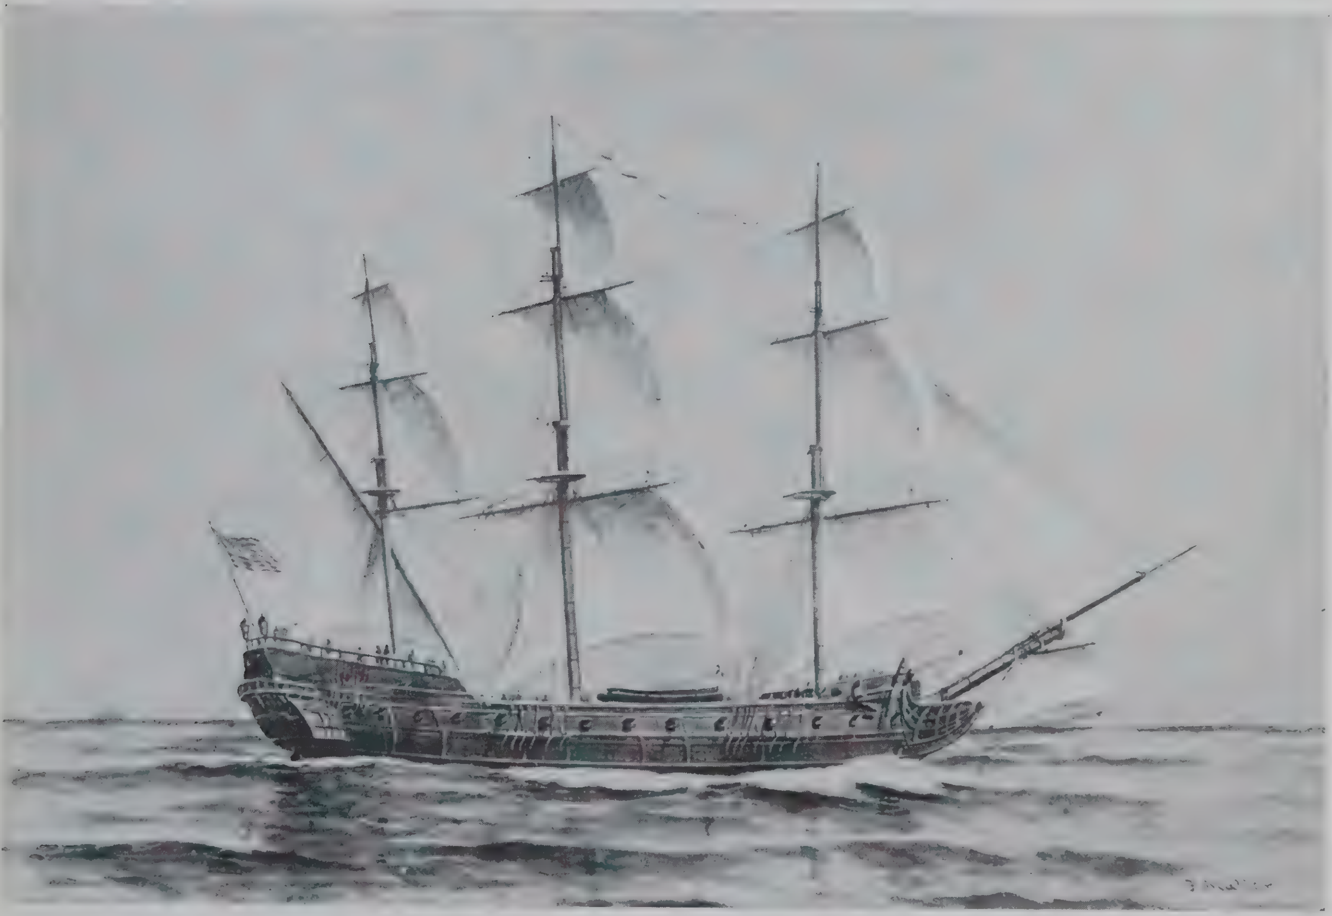
And, on the very next day, Commodore John Paul Jones and his squadron was sailing around the British Isles on the epic cruise previously described.

At home a few months later, a small but gallant Navy suffered a disaster when Commodore Whipple led his squadron to aid in the defense of Charleston, S. C. The frigates, Boston, Providence, Queen of France and Ranger, were trapped when Charleston capitulated to the British.

With French cooperation in the war against Great Britain forthcoming in 1780, Washington felt much encouraged, but failed to accept French reinforcement of troops without a decisive naval participation. And, six months later, the fleet of Admiral Comte de Grasse was off the Cape of Chesapeake, defeating a weaker British force and sealing Cornwallis' doom at Yorktown.

The Virginia State naval forces aided in the transportation of troops and supplies for the Yorktown campaign. And, for many months before the Yorktown campaign and thereafter until the end of the war, the Continental Navy activities were at a low ebb. This little force had carried its heavy burden well throughout the war.

Commanded by John Paul Jones, the Bon Homme Richard fought and captured the British ship Serapis in a stirring battle by moonlight off Flamborough Head in 1779.



Progress stopped with the coming of independence, however, and the vessels were sold and the men discharged.

Trouble with France came later. As France was still at war with England, she looked toward the United States to protect the West Indies. France attacked our ships when she realized that Washington was determined to stay out of the quarrel. Three frigates, the Constellation, the Constitution and the United States, had been built in 1794. The senior officer, with the rank of Commodore, was the same John Barry who had distinguished himself in the Revolution. This infant Navy was soon ordered by Congress to proceed to the West Indian waters.

The Constellation, Captain Thomas Truxton, met the French frigate, L'Insurgent, off St. Kitts; several hours of hard fighting convinced the French to haul down their flag. And, just one year later, La Vengeance was silenced by the Constellation.

The trouble with France had barely ended when the United States was once more thrust into fighting. For a long time, pirates from the Barbary Coast had been preying upon the commerce of Christian nations. The countries of Europe and the United States had been paying tribute to these pirates, but the more they received the more dissatisfied the pirates became. War was inevitably declared and the Americans soon had a squadron in the Mediterranean.

When the Philadelphia, Captain William Bainbridge, ran into a reef in the harbor of Tripoli, she fell into the hands of the enemy. Stephen Decatur planned to go into the harbor and destroy the American ship, which was now manned by the enemy. With seventy men, he reached the ship, overpowered her crew and set the Philadelphia ablaze.

At this time, the United States was once more restlessly holding her peace with Great Britain. British men-of-war were seizing American merchantmen and the Americans soon became exasperated. The feeling steadily grew worse, when British ships stopped American vessels and seized members of her crews, saying that they were British citizens. War was declared in 1812.

The first encounter on the sea took place when Captain Isaac Hull, in command of the Constitution, met the English frigate, Guerriere, a hundred miles east of Boston. Captain Dacres of the British boat opened fire, but the Constitution held back. Hull meant that every shot should tell. Crouching until the Guerriere was well within pistol range, Hull shouted, "Now, boys, pour it into them." The Guerriere was so damaged that Captain Hull could not even bring his prize into port.

Captain Stephen Decatur, commanding the United States, scored a victory over the Macedonian no less brilliant than Hull's. This action took place in the vicinity of the Azores.

During the same year, Bainbridge, on the Constitution, sank the British vessel Java off the Brazilian coast in less than two hours. The Americans were so carried away with the victories of this ship that they proudly called her Old Ironsides.

The English suffered a defeat such as they had never had before on the sea. Even the smaller United States vessels were victorious. The Enterprise took the Boxer; the Essex, under Captain David Porter, captured many merchantmen while sailing around Cape Horn.

The Chesapeake was the first American ship lost. She was at anchor in Boston when Captain James Lawrence was sent to fit her out for sea. He found, upon his arrival, that nearly all of the original crew had left, and he was forced to accept the Shannon's challenge, though unprepared and undermanned. The Shannon proved too much for the Chesapeake and she was terribly shattered. Captain Lawrence was mortally wounded and, though his dying words were, "Don't give up the ship," the surrender could not be prevented.

Events of the war looked unfavorable, when a young officer, Oliver Hazard Perry, was sent to Presque Isle on Lake Erie. When he arrived, he found the keels of two

OLIVER HAZARD PERRY—Quick-thinking and ingenious under adverse conditions, this young naval officer captured an entire British fleet on Lake Erie, advancing the American Navy considerably in the eyes of impressed European nations.

The great naval development of the Civil War was the raft-like and ironclad Monitor, which revolutionized marine warfare and helped develop in a short time the improvement of naval construction.

brigs laid and three gun boats well under construction. The two brigs were the Lawrence and the Niagara. The British were alarmed at the news of the Americans' industry and Captain Barclay of the British Navy rushed his squadron to blockade the American ships at Presque Isle. But Perry was too quick for him and had his ships already sailing on Lake Erie on the look-out for the British.

Perry sailed to Malden with the intention of attacking the British fleet there. Sailing on his flagship the Lawrence, displaying a blue banner bearing the words, "Don't give up the ship," he advanced to meet the British. The Lawrence was shattered and most of its crew killed, but Perry, along with eight men and his little twelve-year-old brother, set out in a rowboat through a volley of fire. They managed to reach the Niagara, another American ship, and the fighting continued. Perry sailed into the midst of the British fleet and, surprisingly, within fifteen minutes, Captain Barclay was forced to surrender. For the first time, a message bore the news of the capture of an entire British fleet. "We have met the enemy and they are ours—two ships, two brigs, one schooner and one sloop."

The year 1814 saw another American fleet of fourteen small vessels under Thomas Macdonough. They were attacked by a large British fleet under Captain Downie, but the Americans won the day.

With the exception of the Battle of New Orleans, all major battles of the War of 1812 were fought and won on the sea by a gallant and up-and-coming Navy.

This war found the United States with a navy of 17 ships, aggregating 15,300 tons and carrying 442 guns, manned by 5,025 men. It had no adequate means of any sort for repair or refitting of the vessels. After peace had been assured, the permanent establishment of the Navy had been set at twelve ships of the line, fourteen first-class frigates, three second-class frigates, six sloops of war and a proportionate number of smaller vessels.

Between 1814 and 1825 the more famous craft built were the 74-gun ships Washington, Franklin, Columbus, Ohio, and Delaware. The North Carolina with 102 guns in three tiers of port holes was for a time considered the most powerful warship afloat.

In the meantime the possibilities of steam warships were looming up. The Demologes had been built in 1813, but she was accidently blown up in 1829. She was succeeded in 1837 by the Fulton the Second, a wooden steam battery. It proved a failure, however. The Mississippi and Missouri, side-wheel steamers, were constructed four years later, and were followed in 1837 by the Susquehanna and Powhatan. In 1844 the first screw steam war vessel ever built was launched. It was the Princeton designed by Captain John Ericsson. Though broken up in 1849, she was in service long enough to aptly illustrate the naval importance of screw propulsion.

The Engineer Corps of the Navy, amalgamated with the Corps in 1899, was organized by an act of August 1, 1842. And in 1845, The United States Naval Academy was established at Annapolis.

The screw steam war vessel was now fully developed, and between 1856 and 1859 the Niagara, Merrimac, Colorado, Minnesota, Wabash and Roanoke, frigates, were built. The sloops Brooklyn, Lancaster, Hartford, Richmond, Pensacola, Pawnee, Michigan, Narragansett, Dacotah, Iroquois, Wyoming and Seminole were built.

In the War with Mexico, the Navy was primarily used to transport troops and supplies. The nearest base was at Pensacola, nearly 900 miles from Vera Cruz, and it was poorly equipped.

On May 4, 1846, Conner sailed from Vera Cruz in response to reports that a Mexican army was attempting to attack General Taylor at Port Isabel. The Mexicans had crossed the river when the squadron arrived on the 8th at Brazos de Santiago. About five hundred seamen and marines were landed, though General Taylor's victory kept them out of the battle.

The Navy next gave assistance to Taylor's troops in crossing the Rio Grande in the project headed towards Monterey. In the meantime, Fremont's California Battalion was at work on the West Coast.

Perhaps the most noteworthy naval expedition was the capture of Vera Cruz. But the main work of the American Navy in the War with Mexico was the blockade which she effected and the ports which she captured, all of which helped to produce a desire for peace on our terms among the Mexican People.

In 1846 Commodore Biddle undertook to open American commerce to Japan, and though his project was barren in its immediate result, this pioneer project paved the way for the ultimate success of Matthew C. Perry eight years later.

In the meantime the Dahlgren shell gun began to replace the older type of smooth bore. But when the Civil War broke out, the Navy had once more become greatly reduced.

One of the prime factors sealing Confederate defeat in the Civil War was the Union blockade of Southern ports.

When the United States Naval Yard at Norfolk was abandoned, a new vessel, the Merrimac, was sunk. The Confederates raised her, cut off her sides, added a sloping roof of iron and renamed her the Virginia. On March 8, 1862, she came out and destroyed the Cumberland and the Congress. But on the next day, when she came out to finish the destruction of the Union fleet, she was met by "a little cheese box on a raft." This was the Monitor, an ironclad ship of a new type, invented by a man named Timby and improved by John Ericsson. The two ships fired at each other for five hours, neither doing any harm to her enemy. However, the Merrimac was no longer the dread of the seas, and was destroyed by the Confederates when they surrendered Norfolk to the Union forces.

David Glasgow Farragut—Famous naval commander of the Union Forces, sailed up the Mississippi to New Orleans through fire of two powerful forts to capture the prize city on April 25, 1862.

A memorable success for the Union forces was Admiral Farragut's expedition up the Mississippi to New Orleans. He passed through the fire of Fort Jackson and St. Phillip to take possession of the city.

In accordance with American naval policy, as illustrated after each previous war, once more the United States greatly reduced its Navy after the Civil War. By the fall of 1866 the total number of vessels in commission numbered only 115. League Island was used as a storage base for the monitors, and there they were gradually destroyed. Five were retained, however, and were used in brief harbor visits during the Spanish-American War. But the monitors, the Miantonomah and the Monadnock, made long voyages and illustrated the sea-going capacity of these turret ships. Their voyages to Europe and around Cape Horn, respectively, doomed to final distinction the wooden man-of-war.

But, one by one, the vessels were broken up or sold, and 1881 saw the country practically defenseless as far as sea power was concerned. The Secretary of the Navy said in his report of 1887, "It is often the subject of wonder what has become of the $70,000,000 spent upon war vessels since the close of the War, in view of the fact that there is now no Navy." Though the ships of the United States Navy were few, the men who handled them did not retrogress. The quality of the Navy personnel remained of the best.

Secretary Hunt appointed an advisory board in 1881 to determine the requirements of a new Navy. The Board recommended 21 armored vessels and 70 unarmed ones, but it should be noted that the Board required that the material of construction should be steel. And, in May of 1887, contracts were signed with the Bethlehem Iron Company for gun forgings and armor plates. During the same year, the now great naval gun factory in the Washington Navy Yard was begun.

Our modern Navy saw its beginning with the construction of the steel vessels the Dolphin and the Atlanta, Boston and Chicago. After 1888 the increase became rapid, and the outbreak of the Spanish American War in 1898 found the United States with a steel fleet of 77 vessels. This fleet included several coastline battleships such as the Iowa, Indiana and Oregon. The powerful armored cruisers, the New York and the Brooklyn, were also a part of this much improved fleet.

Our Navy practically annihilated that of Spain, during the Spanish American War, in 110 days. And, in addition to the great naval battles of Manila and Santiago, the famous rush of the Oregon from San Francisco to Jupiter Inlet, Florida around Cape Horn further proved the capability of this new steel Navy. The Oregon had covered some 14,000 miles in 68 days without an accident.

Since the liberation of Cuba had been stated as the object of the War, Sampson believed it necessary to attack its capitol city, Havana. Admiral Cervera, with his weak Spanish squadron, was supposedly off Cape Verdes. The news arrived that Cervera had left the Cape but was later contradicted. Sampson was instructed to open hostilities by blockading a portion of the Cuban coast.

Dewey had held his squadron in Hong Kong since February, and though ill-equipped with supplies, he held his vessels in readiness. His squadron comprised the Olympia, Boston, Raleigh, Concord, and Petrel. The Squadron sailed on April 27, passed through the silent batteries on Corregidor, and arrived before dawn at Manila. The amazing victory of Commodore Dewey at Manila has been recorded many times, and it should be noted here that it put the Commodore in control of the situation at Manila. America had suddenly become an Oriental power.

In the meantime, Sampson had decided to relieve the situation at San Juan. Smaller vessels of the fleet upheld the blockade at Havana. Schley at Santiago, aided by other naval personnel, accomplished his purpose, and it was through these decisive naval actions that the War was brought to a close. The naval victory off Santiago brought the War to an end.

The history of the United States Navy from the end of the War in 1898 to the advent of vessels of the Dreadnaught type demands but little attention. Good vessels were built, but on no large scale.

In 1906, an enlarged building program was inaugurated, and when war was declared on Germany in April of 1917, the tonnage of the United States Navy was 1,500,000. A great program of naval expansion was entered upon in 1916, due to the strained conditions already existing between Germany and the United States. The building period was to last three years, the total cost to reach approximately $520,000,000. During the first year, four battleships, four battle cruisers, four scout cruisers, 30 submarines, and 20 destroyers were laid down. This was followed by six more battleships, two battle-cruisers and a number of smaller vessels.

With the opening of hostilities, the United States had 787 vessels of all kinds, including a large number of submarine chasers.

The personnel of the Navy was increased from 19,500 to 322,000. Naval reserves grew from a few hundred to 42,000. Ships in commission increased from 300 to 1,000; and the monthly expenditure jumped from $8,000,000 to $60,000,000.

The American Navy's role in the first World War was not rich in direct contact with the enemy. The old armored cruiser, San Diego, sank from a mine. The Minnesota hit another and barely made port. Two armored yachts were torpedoed in the Mediterranean, and the destroyer Jacob Jones was similarly hit in the Channel by a German U-Boat. The U. S. destroyers, Fanning and Nicholson, sank a sub and captured her crew while the armored yacht, Christabel, severely damaged another. A powerful battery of naval guns on railway mounts aided in the offensive on Sedan and Meziere during the final Allied drive.

Our Navy's primary role in this War was to convoy troop ships, bring over supplies and suppress the submarine menace.

At the close of the European War, our Navy had increased to an organization, equipped to fight, of more than 2,400,000 tons. Three superdreadnaughts, the most powerful afloat, were added in 1917 and 1918. More than 100 destroyers were built and many other vessels. In 1919 the Navy adopted the policy of maintaining two great fleets—one in the Atlantic and one in the Pacific.

Admiral Evans, in command of the United States Navy, sailed with the entire fleet in one of the most spectacular cruises in Naval History. The excursions around the Atlantic Coast from December 16, 1907, to February 20, 1909, went without mishap, creating public good-will for a future and large building program.

Naval aviation expanded extraordinarily during the War and resulted in making the Navy's air arm an integral part of the fleet. In 1919 Lieutenant Commander A. C. Read, in the sea-plane, NC-4, made a pioneer flight across the Atlantic. The principal problem, however, was to closely connect the planes with the ships. The work of Rear Admiral Moffett as Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, from 1921 to 1933, is noted for the progress made in the incorporation of aircraft with men-of-war. By 1935 nearly 1,000 planes were on hand, serving with the fleet. Practically all battleships and cruisers carried planes as part of their regular equipment.

But this program of naval expansion was abruptly halted in 1922 by the agreement made with Great Britain, Italy, France and Japan at the Conference on Naval Disarmament held in Washington. By the terms of this five-power treaty, signed in Washington, the United States was permitted a tonnage of 525,000 and was placed on an equality with Great Britain.

The Washington Treaty was to remain in force until December 31, 1936; but in 1934, Japan became dissatisfied with the 5-5-3 ratio and insisted upon her right to parity with the strongest naval powers. Under the terms of the Treaty, this action necessitated the calling of a conference. The conference was held in London in 1935, and in 1936, the United States, Great Britain and France signed a qualitative treaty. Japan and Italy declined to sign.

The surprise attack on the American air forces and fleet at Pearl Harbor by the Japanese was marked by a treachery unparalleled by civilized peoples. The attack occurred in the midst of diplomatic negotiations in Washington which had only been undertaken at the urgent request of the Japanese. And the result of the attack was an all-out war on the part of the United States, which far outweighed the temporary naval advantages gained by the Japanese.

However, the immediate result was a virtual demobilization of our fleet in Hawaii. Fortunately, a strong part of the fleet bound for the Philippines escaped disaster and was diverted to Australia.

Guam, Wake and Midway were promptly attacked. Our Navy found itself a victim of the preceding long era of pacifism which had not only kept down the number of ships, but also prevented adequate base facilities and defense as the steppingstones to the Philippines.

Germany and Italy declared war on the United States on December 11, 1941, and we were thus engaged in a global conflict. But first of all, troops had to be transported and protected from the Aleutians to Australia. Protection of lend-lease convoys had to be maintained. Meanwhile, Japan set about reaping the fruits of her many arduous years of planning and preparation.

Immediately the enemy launched attacks upon the Philippines and Northern Malaya. General Douglas MacArthur's greatly outnumbered American-Philipino Army could only delay any decisive action while falling back on Bataan. Manila and the naval base at Cavite were abandoned necessarily. Fortunately, Admiral Thomas Hart had withdrawn his few cruisers and destroyers to Dutch East Indian bases. A few marines and bluejackets remained behind to reinforce MacArthur's troops.

There were not enough airplanes, food or ammunition on Bataan and Corregidor. Near starvation forced the fall of Bataan on April 9, 1942, and that of Corregidor on May 6.

The Japanese on Malaya had meantime progressed with great success. The British had already lost her two destroyers, the Prince of Wales and the Repulse. Though placed on the defensive, the remaining forces of the United Nations managed to escort ten convoys of reinforcements to that place by February 15 and before the fall of Singapore.

The Japanese also pushed into Burma and through amphibious warfare kept going southward among the Dutch East Indies. They were opposed by a small naval squadron under Admiral Hart, together with Allied forces. American destroyers made a night attack on a Japanese convoy in Macassar Strait on January 24. And on the 25th and 26th, attacks were made which disrupted a large-scale landing attack of the enemy.

But the Japanese seized many positions in the far-flung archipelago. On the 27th, north of Surabaja, Java, the decisive naval battle of the Java Sea took place. The Dutch Admiral Doorman attacked a much stronger enemy squadron and during that night, all five cruisers were sunk. The Dutch DeRuyter and Java, the British Exeter, the American Houston and the Australian Perth went down. The Japanese in the meantime had captured Malaya with Singapore and were overrunning Sumatra and Java and other points in the New Guinea region.

At the request of the Australians, President Roosevelt ordered General MacArthur to proceed to Australia. He escaped from Bataan by fast naval motor boats. They safely reached Mindanao and the General was flown to Australia by army planes.

On January 31, Admiral Halsey with a strong force of carriers, cruisers, and destroyers surprised seven widely separated points in the eastern Marshall Islands simultaneously. Gunfire and bombs damaged enemy shore installations and air fields. Forty-one Japanese planes were destroyed, and 16 ships, including an aircraft carrier, cruiser, destroyer and two submarines met the same fate. Halsey also raided Wake Island on February 24 and Marcus Island on March 4.

Eighteen Japanese heavy bombers attacked a task force headed by Admiral Wilson Brown early in March, west of the Gilbert Islands. Our ships proved well able to take care of themselves. All but two of the enemy planes were shot down by our planes and anti-aircraft guns. Lieutenant Edward H. O'Hare, U. S. N. (deceased), accounted for six. Our ships were not damaged and the Americans lost only two planes and one pilot.

Admiral Fletcher's carrier planes, operating from south of New Guinea, made a brilliant and successful surprise attack against Japanese bases at Salamaua and Lae. And, on April 18, army bombers led by General James H. Doolittle, presumably with naval cooperation, amazed Japan by attacking Tokyo, Yokohama, Kobe and Nagoya.

On May 4, Admiral Fletcher initiated the Battle of the Coral Sea with a surprise air attack on Tulagi. Our loss was only three planes and we sank or damaged a number of Japanese cruisers, destroyers, other vessels and planes. Our planes also sank one carrier and damaged another. However, the American carrier Lexington was severely damaged, and while making for her base, caught fire and blew up. She was abandoned with little loss of life and was sunk by American torpedoes.

Since January, 1942, our naval operations in the Pacific have been under command of Admiral Chester W. Nimitz with headquarters, as Commander-in-Chief of the Pacific Fleet, in Pearl Harbor. Admiral Ernest J. King, Commander-in-Chief of the U. S. Fleet and Chief of Naval Operations, directed him.

Beginning on June 4, a great Japanese armada of 80 vessels was intercepted approaching Midway. The battle lasted three days, until the Japanese withdrew in great disorder. They lost ten large ships, and ten others were severely damaged. The ships sunk included several carriers. It has been estimated that 275 Japanese planes were destroyed. The Americans lost one destroyer and the carrier Yorktown.

At the same time, a small enemy force bombed Dutch Harbor, doing considerable damage. They occupied Kiska and other points in the extreme western Aleutians and a minor type of warfare began in this fog-bound region. On August 7, several cruisers, under Admiral Theobald, surprised the enemy on Kiska and did more damage in 20 minutes than all our months of bombing had accomplished. And in October an Army expeditionary force, operating from Dutch Harbor established a base about 400 miles farther west, with naval support.

In the meantime on August 7, the Navy launched its first really important offensive and captured the recently established bases and airfields of the Japanese on Tulagi and Guadalcanal. This success greatly eased the menace to Australia and to our transpacific supply lanes.

Immediately after Pearl Harbor, the Nazis extended their U-boat operations to the western Atlantic and the U. S. fleet, having no effective means of immediately answering the threat, losses to American shipping was great. Gradually Allied counter measures became effective and the losses began to go down.

Convoy duty and anti-submarine patrols occupied the Atlantic section of the fleet during the early stages of the war and they were able, with the aid of the RAF Coastal Command, to guarantee the safety of most major convoys even in 1940.

The North African operation employed the largest fleet yet assembled by the Allies and, from that time on, active participation of the Navy in the African, Italian and Continental campaigns became an important part of the planning and victorious results. Coordinated fire control with officers of the Navy who went ashore with the invaders resulted in invaluable support. Germany's small but well-built battleship force was practically eliminated.

The Navy's part in the invasion of the continent of Europe cannot be told in detail as this is written but, suffice it to say that the Navy played its part and played it well.

Since mid-1940 the aircraft carriers of the Navy have been multiplied by at least eight, if not more. Naval air activities are grouped under a Deputy Chief of Naval Operations and the Bureau of Aeronautics. The Navy early appreciated the potentialities of the air arm and since 1911 have been experimenting with the airplane as a part of its striking force. The first aircraft carrier, the Langley, has gone down in history and from it sprung the Navy dive bombers, the first true ones of this type. In 1939 the Navy's air fleet consisted of something over 2,000 planes. At the start of 1944 it numbered 23,000 and was still increasing.

The part which our Navy played in the battle of the Pacific; the naval action in the north and south Atlantic; the stellar roles enacted by our seamen while on convoy duty, anti-submarine patrol and off-shore watches; the battles in connection with the landing in North Africa, Salerno, Italy, and the invasion of the European continent will have to be told fully when the war is ended, when every deed can be recorded and every action fully described. Even the heroic work of the men and women who built the ships, the laboratory technicians who labored far into the night to invent and perfect the weapons of war which, as time went on, equalled and surpassed those of the powers who had been treacherousy preparing for the conflict for years; the women who gave up their parties and good times to enter the Service and relieve men for the fighting zone and the mothers who bravely bade their sons "God-speed" and sent them to sea to fight for the common cause, have a part in this history of our Navy.

Suffice it to say that, with able leadership, good ships and their perfected weapons and the gallant men who sail the seas, fly through the clouds or navigate the waters under the surface, with John Paul Jones, we can tell the enemy, "We have not yet begun to fight."

103 YEARS OF NAVAL ORDNANCE

A graphic parallel to the more than 100 year history of the United States Navy's Bureau of Ordnance is to be found in the ever-widening ripples from a stone tossed into a quiet pool of water.

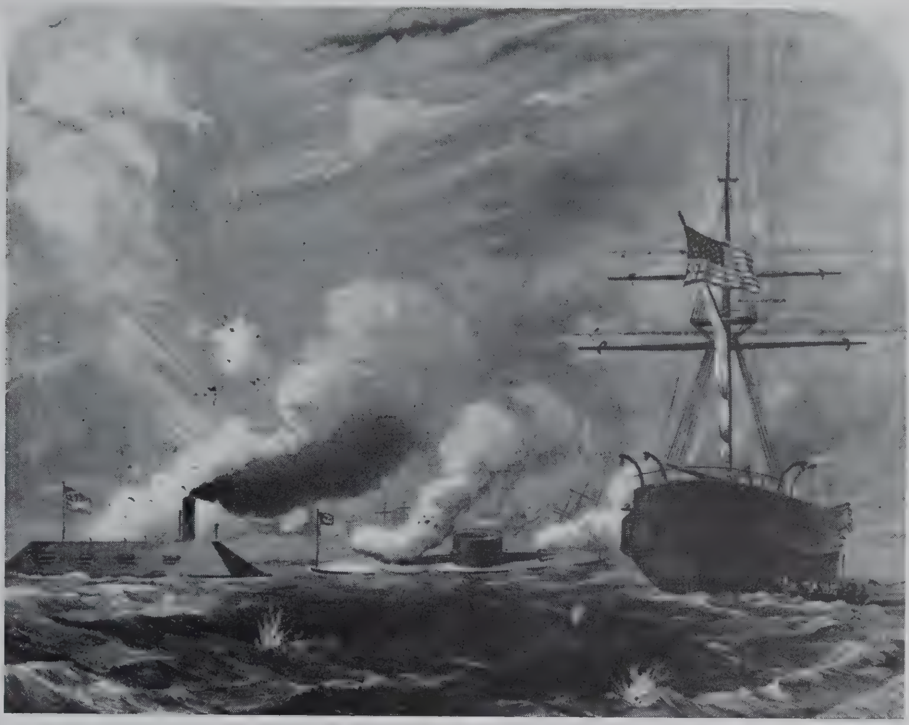
As the stone strikes, a ripple starts and spreads farther and farther with each passing moment.

Let that ripple represent the striking power of a Navy ship, spreading out over a wider and wider area of the ocean surface from 1842 until today. In its constant expansion from its point of origin, you have a quick summary of the 103 years work of the Bureau of Ordnance—aimed always at reaching out farther and farther for the enemy.

For example, when the Bureau of Ordnance was established more than a century ago, the most formidable Navy gun was the 10-inch Columbiad which could strike the enemy barely three miles away. This fighting range has increased over the years, through Bureau of Ordnance research and development, until today our 16-inch naval rifle hurls death and destruction twenty miles away.

The ripple has spread far in these years, and it will continue to spread still farther as the Bureau of Ordnance continues its steady technological advancements in design and construction of long-range guns and shells, torpedoes, rockets, and bombs, armor and all the rest of that vast array of material produced by the Bureau for our Navy's use.

When the Bureau of Ordnance was established, its major task was providing the stately sailing frigates of our 69-ship Navy with clumsy muzzle-loading cannon. Today, Ordnance deals not only with 2000 pound shells for our ships but aerial machine guns firing one thousand rounds a minute. A hundred years ago none of our guns were Navy made here, and many came from Europe. Today our factories and Naval ordnance plants produce every weapon used by our fighting planes and ships.



Battle between Monitor and Merrimac.

In meeting these changes the Bureau has grown from a Chief and four assistants to the 2155 men and women on its rolls today. Nevertheless, despite this growth, the principles early set down still guide the organization. Every pound of powder and explosive used in the Navy's ordnance is planned, loaded and distributed by the Bureau of Ordnance. Responsibility for it from the formula stage until its delivery aboard ship belongs to the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance. The Bureau is in hourly contact with its magazines throughout the United States. To this policy of centralized responsibility the Bureau of Ordnance attributes much of its past successes.

The Ordnance Bureau, along with four others, was formed to supersede the 44-year old plan of running the Navy by committees and boards. The duty of the young Bureau was to maintain the magazines; to manufacture and issue ordnance and ammunition; to issue Navy charts and collect and disseminate hydrographic information. Later the hydrographic duties were separated from the Ordnance Bureau.

For the first eight years of its existence the Ordnance Bureau devoted itself largely to administrative duties, particularly those arising from the Mexican War, and made no significant improvements in the armament of the Navy's vessels. Except that they were larger and their guns were slightly more efficient, the capital ships of 1850 were the same in motive power and material as those in Cromwell's time. But in 1850, young Lieutenant John A. Dahlgren, the Mahan of U.S. Navy Ordnance, introduced his cast iron main battery guns, whose uniform construction and design permitted the manufacturing of much larger pieces than had been known before . . . one of the great advances in ordnance history. In the next six years the Dahlgren guns progressed from blue prints to reality. Our newest ships were armed with them, and they repeatedly proved their worth in the Civil War battles of the next decade. Of 9, 10, 11 and later 15-inch calibers, the Dahlgren guns were originally designed for firing shell, but later were used with solid shot against armor-clads.

When the Civil War began in 1861 the Navy suddenly was called upon to expand to many times its peacetime size. The Bureau of Ordnance bent every energy to find guns with which to arm the hundreds of new vessels which the Navy was hurriedly purchasing. So pressing were its needs that for a time the Bureau was forced to use discarded artillery. However, under the impetus of war and with adoption of the plans for gun building submitted by Dahlgren, improvements of all kinds were made. Mines, explosive shells, spar-torpedoes, armor plate, and big guns were experimented with and developed rapidly in the course of the war. The most dramatic exposition of the new weapons and the defense against them was the battle between the MONITOR and the MERRIMAC. The legend that this battle inaugurated ironclads has been challenged on the ground that in 1862 nearly 100 armored vessels were built or building in Europe. Nevertheless, this was the first duel between two iron-clad ships, and dramatically demonstrated the tremendous value of the revolving turret and the necessity for armor for naval vessels as well as for more powerful armament.

The years after the Civil War saw the introduction of the breech loaders which later on replaced the less efficient muzzle loading gun of our old Navy. And by 1878 most major principles embodied in the construction of guns of the present day had been brought forward and incorporated in the ordnance of the time.

In general, however, the 15 years after the Civil War was a period when expenditures were cut to a bare skeleton. The Navy was not merely at a standstill, but was actually dwindling away. The old wooden ships were dropped from the lists as they got beyond repair, and our few obsolete vessels and antiquated guns were a source of mortification to progressive officers. Our ordnance experts knew that foreign navies were going ahead of us, but they were unable to get any appropriation from Congress for experimental work. As a result, a large proportion of what little new ordnance was obtained had to be ordered from England.

In 1881, however, came the stirrings of new activity. During that year the first hooped or built-up steel, high-powered rifled guns of the U.S.N. were manufactured. Without this built-up method of gun construction armor would soon have attained a complete impenetrability to gunfire, and the subsequent history of naval power would have been vastly different.

Most of the credit for advances in our ordnance during the next decade is due to Rear Admiral Montgomery Sicard, USN, later Commander-in-Chief of the Fleet, who was Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance from July 1881 to January 1890. He was one of the most highly trained ordnance men in the Navy. Immediately upon taking office, the new Bureau Chief found himself confronted with the need for domestic manufacture of machine and secondary battery guns, torpedoes, small arms, search lights, torpedo and submarine boats. All of this presented an entirely new science to the manufacturers of the United States, and much help had to be given them by the Bureau of Ordnance before construction could be undertaken.

In his annual report for 1882, the Secretary of the Navy reiterated this need when he said, "Having no effective guns, it is the duty of the government to begin their manufacture immediately." And he further noted that, "The country is not now capable of making the steel forgings necessary for heavy rifled cannon. They must therefore be procured or inducements offered to steel manufacturers to engage in their production."

Our consequent development in steel forgings, accomplished almost entirely under the impetus of the Bureau of Ordnance, is one of its great contributions, not only to the progress of the Navy, but to all industrial America. For these demands of ordnance upon our infantile steel industry crystallized in the big plants of present day America and helped to put us in our place today at the head of the steel industry of the world.

In 1883, Congress at last awoke to our desperate situation, authorized construction of the cruisers ATLANTA, BOSTON, and CHICAGO. In order to supply these and other new ships with ordnance, a gun factory was installed at the Washington Navy Yard, where it operates today. The first rifled guns mounted aboard these new vessels were 6-inch breech loading rifles, firing a 70-pound projectile with a 35-pound powder charge.

Some of the smaller guns for the new cruisers were built from 1883 to 1888 by the Midvale Steel Company of Philadelphia, which was the pioneer in the manufacture of gun forgings in the United States. In June 1887 the first big order for large gun forgings and armor ever to be placed in this country was undertaken by the newly established Bethlehem Iron Works of South Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. The progress of these two companies soon made it clear that henceforth we could manage our own gun forgings and no more orders need be placed in Europe.

The Bureau of Ordnance was responsible, during these first years of the creation of our new ordnance, for many of the experiments which today are of great importance to industry in general. Special iron alloys were evolved. Hydraulic forging machinery with high power hydraulic pumps were developed. Machine shop tools of larger sizes than had ever before been attempted in the United States were produced. Powerful travelling cranes and conveying machinery were built and first used in connection with the manufacture of ordnance material. The means of casting and handling large unit masses of steel in ingots were worked out. Large plate rolling mills for armor decks of battleships were placed in operation. With a view to producing metal cutting tools which would economically machine heavy armor plate and gun forgings, the widely known "Taylor White" process of treating high-speed steel was developed, which revolutionized machine shop practice for many years to come throughout the world.

This decade between 1880 and 1890 marked the beginning of modern ordnance in the Navy and things moved rapidly. There came, during this period, the electrically controlled torpedo proposed by Lieutenant Bradley A. Fiske, whose name has figured continuously in the development of Naval Ordnance. Progress in gun development brought about experiments in the manufacture of brown powder in order to make us independent of foreign manufacturers, although it was later abandoned for smokeless powder as longer-range guns were introduced. This new smokeless powder was first used in 1887 on the USS MARBLEHEAD; but it was not until after the Spanish-American War that it was employed extensively as superior to the old brown prismatic powder.

A renaissance of target practice and proving work came at this time, and in 1887 Congress appropriated $40,000 for the land for a proving ground. Every advance brought new problems; and by the end of the century the completion of high powered guns raised the question of an American range finder.

During the next ten years—1890 to 1900—under Commodore William M. Folger and Captain William T. Sampson as Chiefs of the Bureau of Ordnance, experiments went along on main battery developments and the first fire control system, a device for controlling aim on warships, was installed on the YORKTOWN. Breech loaders had advanced in design by this time to the 13-inch guns of the OREGON class, and it was predicted that these were the largest guns ever likely to be needed for the Naval service.

The successful results of the Spanish-American War confirmed the policies of using steel forgings for guns instead of adopting the British type of wire-wound guns. The post-war decade also saw progress in experiments with torpedoes. And, because of the increasing production of smokeless powder, the need arose for more magazine facilities at naval stations. Most important of all at this time was the completion of the Proving Ground at Indian Head by Lieutenant Joseph Strauss, later a 4-star Admiral, and Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance in 1913.

By 1900 we had the beginnings of a new Navy, a real fleet, and a new position as a World Power. By this date all ordnance was produced in our own country and the consequent rapid development in all kinds of ordnance—armor, projectiles, powder, torpedoes, fire control and advances in the type of electrical engineering—brought new and larger ships. This in turn produced demands on Ordnance never before made in our Service.

Our first modern target practice took place on the Asiatic Station 1902 and gave the first try-out in speedy loading and continuous firing of new ordnance products. It was a long step from the smooth-bore, brown powder guns of twenty years to the 12-inch gun of the dreadnaught MICHIGAN with her electrically controlled turrets, fire control, smokeless powder, and modern projectiles in broadside salvo-firing. It became apparent that some system of training officers for the special duties of Ordnance was necessary, so a graduate course in Ordnance was established in 1902. The enthusiasm of President Theodore Roosevelt for the Navy made possible increases in efficiency and size of our Fleet, and great strides in gunnery and Ordnance resulted from the "Around-The-World-Cruise" of 1907-1909.

As ranges increased and the tasks imposed were continually heavier, Ordnance design and production were continually improved to keep ahead of the demand of fleet gunnery operation. Each helped the other advance. Developments in the field of electrical engineering led to improvements in our ships, in communications, fire control and safety devices. The power of the 12-inch and 6-inch guns was increased and the question of speed vs. armor and armament resulted in the armored-cruiser.

By 1910 the Proving Ground at Indian Head had been enlarged. Submarines of the HOLLAND class were commissioned and successfully used torpedoes. All brown powder was removed from service, and during 1907 over 1,000,000 pounds of smokeless powder was manufactured at the Powder Factory. The trend of the period was advance in perfection of details rather than in new weapons.

The greater importance of efficient fire-control systems was being emphasized each year as the range increased, and at the Naval Academy midshipmen were first instructed in modern fire control in 1911. Interest in the Navy was concentrated upon gunnery; and, with more powerful guns and standardized gunnery methods, the possibility of long range firing and advanced methods of fire control followed a few years later. Lieutenant Commander Overstreet was the pioneer in the Bureau's fire control development.

Three years later, just before the outbreak of the war, the Bureau of Ordnance decided upon the armor piercing shell as the standard of the Navy, instead of the high explosive shell used by most foreign navies. Prior to America's entry into the World War, the Ordnance of our newest ships was increased to 16-inch, 45 caliber guns, 30 degree elevation in the MARYLAND class, and to 16-inch, 50 caliber in the NORTH CAROLINA and LEXINGTON class.

Although, in accordance with President Woodrow Wilson's policy of no immediate preparation for American entry into the War, the Navy Department had made no special increase in Ordnance, Admiral Joseph Strauss, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, had persuaded Congress to appropriate for reserve guns for merchant ships and for accumulating reserve powder and projectiles. This enabled the Bureau of Ordnance to act immediately when relations with Germany were broken off in February 1917, and with these supplies the first merchant ships were equipped.

It was realized that gun firing ranges were going higher and higher, and demanding an electric, mechanical system which would supplant much of the man power and old time gun pointers for our turret and broadside guns. The noted inventors, Elmer A. Sperry and Hannibal C. Ford, assisted the Bureau of Ordnance in fire control development. Depth charges were first produced at this time.

Nine days after we entered the War in April 1917, the Bureau of Ordnance presented plans for a mine barrage across the North Sea and English Channel to bottle up the German submarines. The plan met much opposition both here and in England, as being impossible to carry out, but the Bureau of Ordnance believed it could be done and so did President Wilson. The job was to manufacture 100,000 mines, then ship them through 3,500 miles of sub-infested waters. Twenty-three cargo vessels were converted into a fleet of mine carriers. To fill the mines with explosives a mine loading plant of 22 buildings was erected at St. Julien's Creek, Virginia, capable of receiving, loading and shipping 1000 mines a day. On August 7, 1918, by Presidential Proclamation, the Naval Mine Depot at Yorktown, Virginia, was established. Advanced bases for inspection and assembly of mines were established in February 1918 on the east coast of Scotland. A mine Squadron was created for the work of laying the mines, and Admiral Strauss, who had been Chief of the Bureau, was placed in charge of the Squadron. This was all accomplished by October 1918, when 70,000 mines had been laid ten miles from the Orkney Islands off Scotland to the territorial waters of Norway, covering a distance of 230 miles. The cost was approximately $80,000,000, and the achievement was considered one of America's greatest naval contributions in the World War.

Our answer to the Germans' shelling of Paris in 1917 was soon prepared. It was naval guns on railway mounts which could be moved quickly from place to place in a few hours, firing from the rails if necessary. Designs for the mounts were drawn on December 26, 1917, and the first mount was assembled on July 26, 1918, under the command of Captain Charles P. Plunkett, USN. Five were built and sent to France. When the first battery arrived on its way to the front the Germans stopped shelling Paris and never fired another shot. The guns were of a type which formed the main batteries of many of our dreadnaughts—14-inch, 50 caliber, capable of throwing 1,400-pound projectiles nearly twenty-five miles, and were used until the Armistice.

Developments in aircraft during the World War brought about such demand for new type bombs, bombsights and fuses, that a new section in this branch was organized in the Bureau of Ordnance. America had to plan to supply France, England, and Italy with guns and ammunition. Gun ranges had increased to such an extent that the Allies and Germans were making tremendous secret strides in providing fire control for guns at all ranges, and fire direction was instituted from kite balloons or aircraft in what has been termed "Sky Control." Optical glass for the use of our ships, which previously had been purchased from Germany, now had to be made in this country. As a result of the war effort of the Bureau of Ordnance, the country became independent of any other country for its optical glass.

A new Proving Ground at Dahlgren, Virginia, was started to enable modern guns and mounts to be tested at extreme ranges. What was thought to be sufficient at Indian Head thirty years before, was now only adequate as a powder factory.

Ordnance expenditures of the World War totaled over a billion dollars in two years. Between February 3, 1917, and the Armistice on November 11, 1918, all vessels under the American flag were provided with ordnance. Tremendous reserves of powder and projectiles were built up at the naval magazines, and new plants were completed for use in the years following the war.

A few production figures summarize the results: 10,000 guns of different calibers were contracted for; 15 million projectiles of different calibers; 100 million pounds of smokeless powder; 5,700 torpedoes; 870,000 depth charges; 150,000 mines; 47 millions of powder tanks, and 37 million pounds of TNT.

After the World War the Navy again fell on lean times. In accordance with the provisions of the 1922 Treaty for Limitation of Armaments many of our ships were scrapped and plans for others were discarded. Ordnance was similarly curtailed. The Bureau of Ordnance appropriation for 1923-24 shrunk to $47,470,000 from its 1918 high of $586,915,267.

However, though the Navy's budget was small, the Bureau of Ordnance was alive to the Ordnance needs of our Navy then and in the next war if there should be one. The United States Navy took the lead in devising new methods of fire control. Calibration of guns for decreased dispersion took place; methods of "indirect fire" or indirect observation through the use of aircraft as spotters, were improved; and night firing, through the use of star shells bursting over the enemy was perfected.

Meanwhile the problems of Naval Aviation Ordnance were beginning to attract more and more attention. In the World War no bombs were dropped from planes against ships at sea. As late as 1927 and 1928, 5,000 feet was the greatest altitude possible for a plane to drop a bomb with any degree of accuracy with the bomb sight then in use. The effectiveness of the bomb at that time was about equal to the progress which gunnery had attained in 1902.

With the increasing influence of aircraft it was evident to the Bureau of Ordnance that air attack would play a tremendous part in any future war. So, throughout the twenties and thirties the Bureau's experts strained every effort to improve bombs and all Aviation Ordnance. However, as is always the case when one type of weapon is developed, a counter weapon is soon found. So the Bureau of Ordnance also worked on anti-aircraft guns that could be used against airplanes as well as the guns to be used by them, and armor for the ships' decks, the planes and for the pilots and gunners in them.

It was logical that along with this advance went great progress in fire control, not only on shipboard, but on planes and on submarines—in short, fire control for every weapon which the Navy used. The increasing ranges of all our guns had made great developments in fire control essential, and that advance is one of the great contributions of the Bureau of Ordnance in the period between the wars. Torpedoes, mines, depth charges—all were fertile fields of development for the Bureau of Ordnance. In fact, the twenty-three years of peace were used by the Bureau to develop every type of weapon that could effectively be used aboard planes, ships above the sea, submarines under the sea, and by surface ships against each other as well as against both planes and undersea craft. Surface firing between ships has not been developed radically in recent years as in other branches, however, and relatively few changes have been shown, so far at least, in this War.

The Bureau of Ordnance is now more than one hundred years old. The Bureau has seen the U. S. Navy go from a third-rate power to a place at the top, and it feels a proper pride in its contribution to that rise. Now the greatest war in history is writing a new chapter in the story of the Bureau. When the time comes to read it, it will be found no less important.

To All Hands:

The mission of the Naval Mine Depot is to store high explosives; to fill, service, and store mines, depth charges, war heads, torpedoes, anti-submarine devices, aircraft rockets and bombs and their component parts, in order to maintain a supply and provide a reserve for the U. S. Fleet.

That we have executed our mission has been fully confirmed by letters, telegrams and cables setting forth the damaging blows inflicted on our enemies by munitions which were loaded and assembled here. That we, of this command, are playing an important and essential part in the successful prosecution of the war, is unquestioned.

It is altogether fitting, therefore, that we should have this pictorial record of our wartime Naval Establishment as a lasting reminder of those associated with us in the common cause.

To each and every one of you I extend sincere greetings and a grateful acknowledgment of the loyal and enthusiastic part you have played at the Naval Mine Depot during World War II.

ROBERT DUDLEY KIRKPATRICK

CAPTAIN, USN (Ret.)

Commanding

Entered the Naval Academy on July 1, 1909, and graduated in 1913 as Ensign. First duty was aboard armored cruiser, USS MARYLAND on the West Coast. From that time on, served in the following capacities: Executive Officer and Chief Engineer of the USS HULL, 1914-1916, on the West Coast and the west coast of Mexico; student naval aviator, Naval Air Station, Pensacola, Florida, qualified as naval aviator and was ordered to the Navy Department in 1917; served during most of the war in the Office of Naval Aviation as Officer-in-Charge of the training and assignment of all aviation personnel. Was ordered abroad on special duty in connection with aviation about two months before the armistice was signed and returned to the Navy Department about one month after the armistice was signed; in 1918 assumed duty as Executive Officer, Naval Air Station, San Diego, California; in the same year took the original Naval Air Unit to Hawaii, where established and built the first naval air station, 1919-1922. In the course of the duty, took the first aircraft to the islands of Midway and Palmyra and made aerial photographic mosaics of those islands; was then assigned as aide on staff of Commander, Air Squadrons Battle Fleet, 1922-1923; assigned duty as Fleet Aviation Officer on staff of Commander in Chief, U.S. Fleet until September, 1926. at which time was ordered to temporary duty in the Bureau of Aeronautics, Navy Department, upon completion of which in January, '27 was ordered to London, England, as Assistant Naval Attache' for Aviation. Was attached to the embassies of London, Paris, Berlin, and the Hague, during this tour. As additional duty inspected all aviation facilities in Spain and general naval facilities in Bizerte, French North Africa; returned to the United States in November, 1928. Served on the USS ARKANSAS as First Lieutenant until June 1930; Commanding Officer, USS HATFIELD and USS HOPKINS until June 1931 at which time was assigned to duty at the U.S Naval Academy until 1934; was Executive Officer, USS DOBIN, 1934-1936; then in Ship Movements Office, Office of Naval Operations, Navy Department 1936 to 1939. Was next assigned as Executive Officer of the battleship, USS COLORADO, from July 1939 until December 1939 at which time was selected for promotion to the grade of Captain and transferred to duty as Chief of Staff, Atlantic Squadrons. Served in that capacity until early 1940 when suffered a heart attack; transferred to Naval Hospital, Annapolis, Maryland, was retired for physical disability on March 1, 1941. Was immediately recalled to active duty. Served as Officer-in-Charge, Branch Hydrographic Office, Seattle, Washington, 1941-1942. Assumed duty as Commanding Officer, Naval Mine Depot, on November 2, 1942.

HERBERT PAUL RICE

CAPTAIN, USN

Executive Officer

Entered U.S. Naval Academy in June 1921 and graduated in 1925. Served on board crusier ROCHESTER, flagship of Special Service Squadron in Central American waters, with detached duty ashore in Nicaragua during the revolutionary and bandit campaigns in 1927-28; entered submarine service in 1929 and served in USS S-18 in East Coast, Canal Zone, and Hawaiian waters. Was ordered in 1932 to the Naval Training Station, Newport, Rhode Island, as Battalion Commander and Aide to Executive Officer; in 1933 to the Naval Academy as instructor in Electrical Engineering and Physics; assigned in 1934 to USS SALINAS as Cargo and Communications Officer; in 1935 to heavy cruiser HOUSTON as Plotting Room Officer. Returned to Naval Academy in 1937 as instructor in Ordnance and Gunnery, and in 1939 was ordered to the battleship IDAHO as Assistant Gunnery Officer and spotter, and as Gunnery Officer in 1941. While serving in the IDAHO, engaged in convoy and patrol duty in North Atlantic and Iceland waters, and participated in numerous bombardments and occupations of Japanese installations in the Aleutians and Central Pacific 1942-1944. Was ordered as Executive Officer, Naval Mine Depot, Yorktown, Virginia, in March 1944.

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF U. S. NAVAL MINE DEPOT

The Surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown in October, 1781, marked the climax of the American Revolution. With this victory of the allied French and American forces over the British, the war virtually ceased. The long fight for the principles of self-government proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence had in reality been won.

Because of its association with this great event, Yorktown has come to hold a place of great significance in the history of our country, and rightly so. However, there is much of interest about Yorktown and the country around it during the years prior to the Revolution. The lands now included in the Naval Mine Depot figured prominently in the early history of the Colony of Virginia and it is therefore in order to point out some of the old landmarks.

The first English colonists to establish a permanent settlement in the New World landed at Jamestown in May, 1607. From Jamestown, which became the capital and the seat of government for the Virginia Colony, settlers began to spread into the neighboring country. They were encouraged to do this to take up new land and also to push out the Indians. As early as 1611, a letter of Sir Thomas Dale, the Deputy Governor, recommended a fortified place at Chiskiack. This was the name of the Indian tribe on the York River just above Yorktown. Their village is believed to have been in the vicinity of Officers' Quarters.

In further encouragement to settlers, the Colonial Council offered fifty acres of land to every person who would settle on the York River. This was in 1630. In the same year two tracts of 600 acres each were taken up, one lying east of Felgate's Creek. This particular tract was granted to Captain John West. In 1650 it was purchased by Edward Digges, Governor of the Colony, who built a fine brick house on it for his home. His plantation of about 1,250 acres later came to be known by the name of "Bellfield." It included the general area known today as "Aviation" and "Felgate's Crossing" and became famous in England for the fine quality of "sweet-scented" tobacco which it produced.

During Governor Digges' term as governor, a serious effort was made to introduce silk manufacture into the colony. An act was passed requiring each land holder to plant and cultivate ten mulberry trees for every 100 acres of land. Two Armenians were employed to teach the colonists, and a reward of 5,000 pounds of tobacco was offered to the person who would first make 100 pounds of wound silk within the colony. This explains the great number of mulberry trees along the roads and streets and around old house sites in this section of Virginia.

These old mulberry trees, knotty and scraggly with age, are mute reminders of the past and of those who first established their homes in this new country. Little remains of Bellfield other than the ruins of the brick foundations of the house. Nearby, massive gravestones for members of the Digges family, with their long epitaphs, have become permanent markers for the site of this early home.

Similarly elegant in its day and remembered since for its fine house and its beautiful situation on the York River was Ringfield, named for Joseph Ring who owned it. This old plantation contained the tract lying between Felgate's and King's Creeks. The house was destroyed by fire since the Depot was established. Brick foundations of the main house and outbuildings, and the old gravestones in the family burying ground close by, lie on the high ground of the triangle formed by the Colonial Parkway, King's and Felgate's Creeks.

Other early homes on the Depot were "Stony Point" which stood where the Marine Barracks are now located and "Indian Fields" on the site of the present Officers' Quarters. The ancient cedars forming a line along each side of the road to Officers' Row preserve even today the original character of that inviting and pleasant approach to "Indian Fields."

Except for the clumps of old mulberry trees to mark the site, the old gravestones, and in a few instances the buried ruins of brick foundations, little is left of these early homes. Notable exception is the Lee House. Though a lonely ruins now, its heavy brick walls rise solidly and almost intact after having withstood the ravages of fire and weather for more than 200 years. It was the home of nine generations of Lees, the first of whom was Henry Lee, prominent in his time but not so well remembered as his brother Richard, forebear of the Stratford Leas—Richard Henry, Francis Lightfoot, Colonel "Light Horse" Harry Lee and his son, General Robert E. Lee. Unlike the other fine homes of his neighbors which were close by and overlooked the York River, the Lee House stood deep inland near the headwaters of Felgate's Creek.

One of the most ancient landmarks to be seen in the Naval Mine Depot is the old Williamsburg Road which connected Jamestown, Williamsburg and Yorktown. Following what originally was probably an Indian Trail, this road came to be the main traveled way across the peninsula. It was along this road, which can still be followed for about four miles through the Depot, that General Washington marched his army to Yorktown to the siege of Yorktown and the victory that was to mark the end of the long war. Few roads in the entire country are so historic or remain so nearly in their original condition as the old Williamsburg Road through the Naval Mine Depot.

The accessibility and convenience to the excellent waterway and harbor afforded by the York River was an item of great importance to the early planters of Virginia. Water was their chief means of transportation and communication—for shipping their produce and obtaining supplies from England. Peculiarly enough, this same factor, the fine harbor provided by the York River, its proximity to the coast and at the same time the protection afforded by its inland location, was one of the reasons for its selection as a site for the Naval Mine Depot.

When the United States in World War I undertook the tremendous operation of laying the North Sea mine barrage, a location on the Atlantic Seaboard where mines could be stored, assembled, loaded, tested and issued to the Service was vitally necessary. Also, a station was needed to build up and train personnel in the assembly and adjustment of mines. As a result, a tract of about 18 square miles on the York River above Yorktown was selected. The land was commandeered by Presidential Proclamation dated August 7, 1918, and the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department assumed possession one month later.

The Armistice on November 11 brought an end to the war, but plans and construction for the Naval Mine Depot continued steadily. First attention was given to shops, storehouses, service and transportation facilities and living quarters. In 1921, the Administration Building and the Officers' Quarters were occupied. A water system was put into partial operation in November 1922, roads and railroads were constructed, boundaries mapped and fenced. The Depot made its own electricity until commercial power became available in 1928.

Of interest but barely remembered today is the Flying Field that was built on the Mine Depot. The history of this activity explains the term "Aviation" applied today to the area generally between the Colonial Parkway and Felgate's Crossing. The Atlantic Fleet Torpedo Plane Squadron used this field from January to September, 1921. The naval land planes participating in the bombing of the ex-German ships—to test the much disputed effectiveness of aerial bombing—were based on the Yorktown field. During the fall of 1922, the U.S.S. LANGLEY lay in the York River for the purpose of conducting experiments and tests. Some of the buildings at the Air Station were occupied by personnel from the LANGLEY and the planes used the field for their operations. Recreational facilities were provided on the Depot for the men from the Atlantic Fleet while it was in the York River during the fall and summer of 1922.

After withdrawal of the Torpedo Plane Squadron, except as mentioned above, the Flying Field was never in active use again. Some hangars were used for stowage of non-explosive mine parts. One was dismanteled and shipped to the Naval Air Station at Lakehurst, New Jersey; another to Anacostia, Washington, D. C.

The activities of the Depot, after completion of the Initial construction, were more or less routine, consisting of reclamation of depth charges, overhauling mine anchors, preparation for shipment and receipt of mines and mine material to and from other naval stations and vessels of the Mine Force. Experimental loading of aero bombs was begun on a limited scale.

The continual receipt and accumulation of TNT, much of which was stored in the open at Aviation Field, created a storage problem at the Depot. This condition and the explosion at Lake Denmark in 1927 finally resulted in approval of an appropriation by Congress in 1927 for 77 new magazines and connecting roads between them. These magazines were of a new type adopted after the Lake Denmark disaster. These units form the nucleus of the present magazine group to which a number of new ones have been added since 1939. Special attention was given in the location of these new units to separation by safe distances and the use of existing features of the terrain for natural barricades. Except for work on the pier to repair damages caused by the heavy storm in August 1933, administration of the Naval Mine Depot was more or less routine maintenance and protection.

The Depot accomplished a great deal of useful work during the depression years with the aid of the emergency agencies such as WPA and the CCC. This work was largely devoted to building new fire breaks, patrol roads and the maintenance of existing facilities. These activities were just being closed out when the advance planning and initial construction for the present war started. This program has continued with increasing intensity and pressure from which there has been little let-up since. As a result a great change has come to the peace and quiet of the Naval Mine Depot. The number of civilian employees has increased from a few hundred to as many thousand; officers more than ten times. New roads, new plants and equipment, new housing units—these all bespeak new and varied operations and activities, the full telling of which will have to wait perhaps for another two-score years, for another generation, but not—let us hope—until another war.

NAVAL MINE DEPOT CHAPEL

YORKTOWN

Yorktown is remembered primarily because of its association with the surrender of Lord Cornwallis to General Washington and the Allied Army on October 19, 1781. In recognition of this great historic event, the federal government has established the Colonial National Historical Park which is administered by the National Park Service of the Department of the Interior. Included in the park are the Yorktown Battlefield and Jamestown Island, site of the first permanent English settlement in this country. One of the outstanding features of the park is the Colonial Parkway, a scenic roadway connecting Yorktown and Williamsburg which, when completed, will extend to Jamestown Island. The parkway runs along York River for practically the entire length of the Depot.

The village of Yorktown today contains a number of the houses and other structures of colonial times. The British earthworks as modified and strengthened by the Confederate forces during the War Between the States lie close around the town. Parts of the outlying allied works have been reconstructed by the National Park Service and in several of the batteries and redoubts so reconstructed, revolutionary cannon have been mounted. In normal times, large numbers of tourists visit the Yorktown-Williamsburg area.

The park area is adjacent to the Mine Depot on the east and south and along the Colonial Parkway which is built on land transferred from the Navy to the Interior Department for this purpose.

Part of the redoubt has been washed away by the York River; remainder reconstructed by National Park Service as part of Colonial National Historical Park which joins Naval Mine Depot on the southeast. BRUTON PARISH CHURCH, WILLIAMSBURG, VIRGINIA

The present church was erected in 1710-1715 to replace an earlier church which became inadequate when the seat of government was moved to Williamsburg. The exterior of the building is largely original.

Less than eight miles from the Naval Mine Depot is Williamsburg, colonial capitol and center of intellectual, cultural, and political life of Virginia during the eighteenth century. Originally a palisaded outpost, called Middle Plantation, it succeeded Jamestown as the capitol of the colony. In 1693 the College of William and Mary, second oldest in the United States, was established there.

Restored recently through the interest and financial aid of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Williamsburg is one of the outstanding points of Erected prior to 1742, this large frame building was the outstanding tavern of its day. Here the Burgesses met; royal governors dined; and the Phi Beta Kappa Society is said to have been founded. The tavern was destroyed by fire in 1859 and reconstructed on original foundations in 1930.

educational and historical interest in the entire country. Among the most significant buildings that have been restored are the Capitol, the Raleigh Tavern, the Governor's Palace, the George Wythe House, Bruton Parish Church, and the Wren Building at the College of William and Mary.

GOVERNOR'S PALACE, WILLIAMSBURG, VIRGINIA

The Palace for the royal governors, built 1706-1718, was the center of fashion and social life in the Virginia colony. It has been reconstructed upon its original foundations with its offices, kitchens, outbuildings, formal gardens and canal.
